

Sean McAlinden is the executive vice president of research and chief economist at the Center for Automotive Research, a not-for-profit institute in Ann Arbor, Michigan. McAlinden has also performed contract research for the U.S. Departments of Commerce, Education, and Labor; the Library of Congress; and numerous foundations, corporations, labor unions, and state and local agencies. In addition, he has provided expert testimony to legislative bodies. McAlinden worked for four years at the Industrial Technology Institute in Ann Arbor as a manufacturing economist. He later moved to the University of Michigan's Office for the Study of Automotive Transportation as an associate research scientist, and he eventually moved with that entity to help create the Center for Automotive Research. McAlinden completed a doctoral dissertation in economics at the University of Michigan.