

Thomas DeLeire, Ph.D.

Thomas DeLeire, Ph.D. is an associate professor of population health sciences, public affairs and economics at the University of Wisconsin-Madison. His research focuses on labor and health economics. His recent work is on economic mobility, family structure, choice of occupation, health insurance, and the well-being of poor households.

In other work, Dr. DeLeire has examined the effect of the Americans with Disabilities Act on the employment of disabled citizens, the extent to which disabled workers face wage discrimination by employers, and the role that tax-favored savings accounts play in increasing national savings. Dr. DeLeire has twice taken leave from his university appointments to work in government. From 2005 to 2007, he was a senior analyst at the Congressional Budget Office; and from 2002 to 2003, he was senior economist for labor, health, and education for the Council of Economic Advisers.

Dr. DeLeire previously taught at Michigan State University, the University of Chicago, and Harvard University. He received his A.B. from Princeton University in 1990, and his Ph.D. in economics from Stanford University in 1997.
